RE: Parking Meter Revenues Project Approval Request

Dear Mr. Verdugo,

The Little Italy Association (LIA) is requesting approval on the following projects based on Council Policy 100-18.

Relocation of Dockless Bikes within Little Italy
The LIA is requesting the use of Parking Meter Revenues (PMRs) and/or parking related funds (PRFs) for LIA staff payroll associated to the relocation of dockless bikes and/or scooters to facilitate/manage a safe and accessible public right-of-way for pedestrians.

Sidewalk Repair and/or Replacement
The LIA is requesting the use of PMRs and/or PRFs to repair and/or replace, where needed, damaged sidewalks to maintain a safe and accessible public right-of-way.
Precedent: In FY14, the LIA utilized PMRs to demo and replace sidewalks to shrink vacated driveway cut-outs and replace severely damaged sidewalks for pedestrian safety and access and increased surface street parking.

Installation and/or Maintenance of Acorn Lighting
The LIA is requesting the use of PMRs and/or PRFs to acquire, install and/or maintain, where needed, acorn lighting in the public right-of-way. The existing acorns have damage at the basis due to dog urine and general age/corrosion; in this case we are requesting to sandblast, paint and rehabilitate the pole. In some locations, the LIA would like to add new acorn lighting to create a safe and walkable environment for pedestrians at night.
Precedent: In FY17, the LIA utilized PMRs to install freeway overpass lighting under three (3) freeway overpasses to create and safe and walkable environment for pedestrians. Also, in FY19, Core Columbia was permitted to use PMRs for "enhanced lighting" for the same intent.

Purchase of Landscaping Amenities for Pedestrian Safety and Beautification
The LIA is requesting the use of PMRs and/or PRFs to acquire, install and/or maintain, where needed, landscaping amenities in the public right-of-way to create a safety barrier between vehicles and pedestrians. The Piazza della Famiglia is an example of where landscaping amenities have been used to create a safe environment between vehicles and pedestrians.

Precedent: In FY19, Core Columbia was permitted to use PMRs for landscaping amenities for the same intent.

Enhanced Security for Pedestrian Safety

The LIA is requesting the use of PMRs and/or PRFs to subsidized payroll of an existing/established security program, Live Well, Live Safe, which manages public safety within the 48-square blocks of Little Italy. The program has shown success in creating a visible presence for visitors/residents/businesses of Little Italy and creating a safe environment for pedestrians detouring criminal activity.

We look forward to your response. If you have any questions, please feel free to contact me.

The Kilroy Realty six-story project would sit on the block between Ivy and Hawthorn streets in Little Italy.

Big office plans for Little Italy

Project encompassing 1.2 acres welcomed for bringing more work space into restaurant-heavy area

BY PHILLIP MOLNAR

The design committee of Civic San Diego, the city's downtown planning agency, on Wednesday praised plans for a large office building in Little Italy that will take up an entire city block.

Encompassing a 1.2-acre site between Ivy and Hawthorn streets, the Los Angeles-based Kilroy Realty project would take the place of five old commercial buildings, including a dilapidated warehouse. It would be the most office space in a single building in Little Italy.

The six-story building would include roughly 178,800 square feet of office space, 14,929 square feet of retail and 280 parking spots. Renderings of the project show a modern building that mixes a brick exterior with black metal paneling.

"I think this is a gift to the community in terms of its design," said committee director Stephen Russell. "It does incorporate a lot of the flavored texture and variety that makes it seem like it's not a monolithic block."

Kilroy's project will eventually need the approval of the full Civic San Diego board, and city government after that. The project could begin construction as early as November, Kilroy said.

Committee members were concerned about blank concrete walls on the site, including one facing trains, because it could become a magnet for graffiti. Dale Shimek, Kilroy senior project manager, said it would begin work on alternatives, including a spot for public art.

"We'll look at bringing the (materials) down, we'll look at art possibilities, our whole bag of tricks," he told the committee.

The developer purchased the site in late 2017 for $19.4 million and hired the Gensler architecture firm to design the structure.

After a surge of apartment buildings in Little Italy this year, anticipated to include 559 units by the end of the year, neighborhood representatives said they welcome more space for people to work in the area.

"I think we are hitting our limit of restaurants and bars in Little Italy," said Marco LiMandri, administrator of the Little Italy Association. "We want high-density housing, but we also want to balance that with work areas, too."

Matt Carlson, senior vice president of commercial real estate investment firm CBRE, said what makes the development in Little Italy unique is that office builders typically shy away from there because of height limitations caused by the airport. CBRE will handle leasing for the building once it is approved.

"You haven't seen any new office product in that submarket," Carlson said. "I think that the real excitement and interest on Kilroy's land is it is in this great neighborhood. It's got great residential, it's got great retail, it's got all these destination restaurants."

There is roughly 525,000 square feet of office space in Little Italy but none is considered Class A, or high-end, like the Kilroy project, said CBRE data. The biggest office space in the neighborhood right now, 610 West Ash St., has about 1,000 square feet less than what is planned by Kilroy.

The office building would be directly across from the new AV8 apartments on Kettner Boulevard with 129 units. A luxury building with numerous amenities, monthly rent for a studio starts at $2,210.

In a contrast to the high-end units at AV8, the lot across the street purchased by Kilroy is a relic of Little Italy's past as a less-desirable place. Buildings that will be demolished — including old warehouses (many covered in graffiti) and a car rental business — do not have historic significance, said Civic San Diego's staff report.

"Transforming an entire block of underused lots and vacant storefronts into 200,000 square feet of Class A office space, ground floor retail and outdoor plazas cannot happen soon enough for our growing downtown community," wrote Downtown San Diego Partnership CEO Betsy Brennan in an email.

Additional plans for the building include a 1,900-square-foot courtyard along Kettner Boulevard to provide an entry for retail and a public courtyard, as well as a 10,226-square-foot rooftop deck for office building tenants. Parking will have two above-ground parking floors and one and a half below ground.

Civic San Diego staff said the economic impact of the project will be 201 construction jobs and 396 permanent jobs once the building opens.

Panel looks at policing, mentally ill

Video of L.A. deputies releasing a man on the streets spurs council hearing on response to 'gravely disabled.'

By Emily Alpert Reyes and Thomas Curwen

The video alarmed San Pedro residents when it spread through social media in January: a disheveled and seemingly agitated man being dropped off in the neighborhood by L.A. County sheriff's deputies, who had just come from nearby Rancho Palos Verdes.

Los Angeles Councilman Joe Buscaino demanded answers about the incident, calling it appalling. He and other lawmakers lamented that both the Los Angeles Police Department and the Fire Department had responded to calls later that day about the man, who was arrested that night by the LAPD on an outstanding warrant for failure to appear.

But a Sheriff's Department spokeswoman said it was "not a case of dumping," as San Pedro residents living close to other South Bay cities had feared.

At a hearing Wednesday at City Hall, a department representative said its review found that the deputies had not violated their policies.

"We are confident in this case that our deputies acted appropriately and with compassion," Sheriff's Capt. Dan Beringer told the City Council committee.

The video and the ensuing debate have highlighted the challenges that law enforcement faces when trying to assess and evaluate the mental health of people living on the streets.

The man on the video, later identified as John Thomas Bryan, did not meet criteria to be held involuntarily, Beringer said. But after an offer for help, Beringer told members of a council committee focused on public safety.

Instead, the man said he wanted to go back to Pasadena, so the deputies offered him a ride to a bus stop, Beringer said. But on the way there, the captain said, Bryan became belligerent and demanded to be let out of the car.

The answers failed to reassure Buscaino, who argued that based on what he had seen in videos, Bryan should have been eligible for a "5150" hold.

Under California law, authorities can take individuals off the street and put them in the care of a medical facility, where a psychiatric team determines whether they are "a danger to others, or to himself or herself, or gravely disabled." The 5150 hold (the term derives from a numbered section of state law) allows individuals to be detained for 72 hours for assessment and treatment if they meet those criteria.

Buscaino argued that Bryan would have qualified.

"He was not able to care for himself," Buscaino said, describing the man as barefoot with his pants down to his knees.

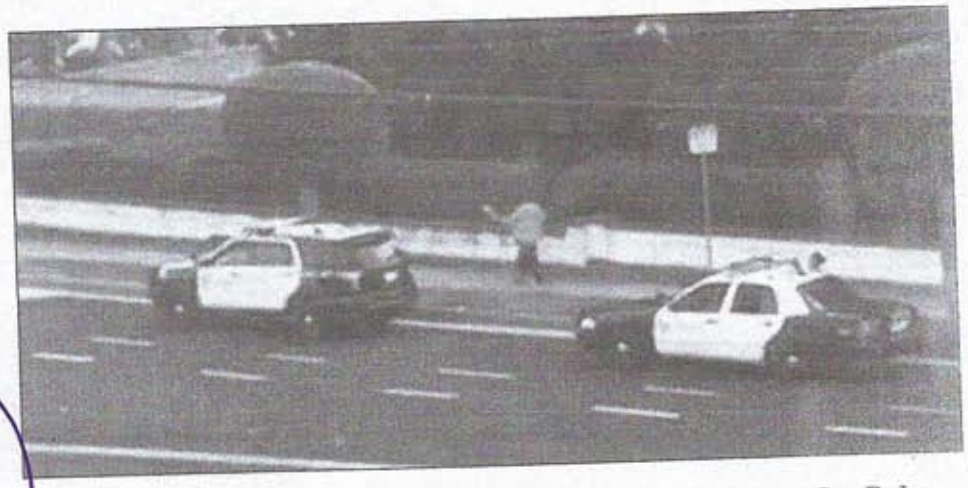
Buscaino, a former L.A. police officer, also questioned why the deputies did not take the man to County Jail on the same warrant that led to his arrest by the LAPD that night. Beringer responded that the jail would not take in someone on an offense with such a low bail amount.

The councilman said the episode spotlighted the broader problems with existing laws on how officers can respond to people suffering from mental illness. He argued that the state needs to expand the definition of "gravely disabled" — an effort backed by county officials — and "find a way to bring back institutionalization."

"The 5150 hold, I've found, is a joke," Buscaino said. "We need to find a longer-care solution to those who are mentally ill and homeless on our streets.... This 24-hour nonsense, this 72-hour nonsense clearly is not working."

Under the law, "gravely disabled" is defined primarily as someone being unable to provide food, clothing or shelter for themselves, or to understand the nature and severity of their illness. Such holds can be extended up to a month and eventually include conservatorship for more than a year.



A VIDEO showing sheriff's deputies dropping off an agitated man in San Pedro raised alarm. A councilman said he should have been detained on a "5150" hold.

The California Legislature is considering an amendment to state laws regarding the involuntary confinement of people with mental illness. AB 1971 would expand the definition of "gravely disabled" to include the need for medical treatment.

The Los Angeles County Council of the National Alliance on Mental Illness has supported a proposed change, but critics have expressed concerns that the bill would infringe on the rights of people with mental illness. Other groups supportive of the proposed change have argued that it will accomplish nothing if there are not adequate services to meet the need.

At the Wednesday meeting, Councilman David Ryu said that the process was frustrating and that "our system sometimes feels like it's designed that, unless you're sick enough, we can't help you."

But Ryu, who has worked for a mental health center, added that government agencies also need to continue expanding services for people with mental illness.

"Right now we're really upset about the 5150 process and how we can't help these individuals. But even if reform happens ... our facilities are all full," Ryu said.

The Los Angeles Homeless Services Authority recently released the results of its annual homeless count, which found that 27% of homeless people in the county reported having a serious mental illness.

Buscaino and other committee members asked Wednesday for the Sheriff's Department and other agencies to report back on training programs for working with homeless people and how to expand services and outreach for the severely mentally ill.

Section of San Pedro now officially called Historic Little Italy

City News ServiceJune 27, 2018 at 6:26 pm

The Los Angeles City Council has officially designated a portion of San Pedro as Historic Little Italy. (Google Maps)

LOS ANGELES — A section of San Pedro was dubbed Historic Little Italy on Wednesday, June 27, by the Los Angeles City Council.

Councilman Joe Buscaino, who is of Italian descent and represents the San Pedro area, introduced the motion calling for the designation, which will include the installation of street signs at key intersections.

The motion says that the history of Italian immigrants in Los Angeles dates back to the 1800s, with high concentrations located initially in what is now the Arts District and Civic Center. By the late 1800s, the motion says the Italian population had grown to around 2,000, with many of the immigrants settling around El Pueblo, and by the 1900s, the Italian community would expand into present-day Chinatown, Lincoln Heights, Elysian Park and San Pedro.

The neighborhood in San Pedro is "now home to the region's largest concentration of persons of Italian ancestry. It is appropriate for the city to memorialize the vibrant enclaves that comprise an important part of our city's history and multicultural fabric," the motion says.

The area of Historic Little Italy will be marked with signs at various intersections, including Ninth Street and Gaffey Street, Ninth Street and Pacific Avenue, Sixth Street and Pacific Avenue, Sixth Street and Mesa Street, 12th Street and Gaffey Street, 12th Street and Mesa Street, 13th Street and Gaffey Street, 17th Street and Gaffey Street, 13th Street and Mesa Street, and 17th Street and Mesa Street.

RE: Parking Meter Revenues Project Approval Request

Dear Mr. Verdugo,

The Little Italy Association (LIA) is requesting approval on the following projects based on Council Policy 100-18.

Relocation of Dockless Bikes within Little Italy
The LIA is requesting the use of Parking Meter Revenues (PMRs) and/or parking related funds (PRFs) for LIA staff payroll associated to the relocation of dockless bikes and/or scooters to facilitate/manage a safe and accessible public right-of-way for pedestrians.

Sidewalk Repair and/or Replacement
The LIA is requesting the use of PMRs and/or PRFs to repair and/or replace, where needed, damaged sidewalks to maintain a safe and accessible public right-of-way.
Precedent: In FY14, the LIA utilized PMRs to demo and replace sidewalks to shrink vacated driveway cut-outs and replace severely damaged sidewalks for pedestrian safety and access and increased surface street parking.

Installation and/or Maintenance of Acorn Lighting
The LIA is requesting the use of PMRs and/or PRFs to acquire, install and/or maintain, where needed, acorn lighting in the public right-of-way. The existing acorns have damage at the basis due to dog urine and general age/corrosion; in this case we are requesting to sandblast, paint and rehabilitate the pole. In some locations, the LIA would like to add new acorn lighting to create a safe and walkable environment for pedestrians at night.
Precedent: In FY17, the LIA utilized PMRs to install freeway overpass lighting under three (3) freeway overpasses to create and safe and walkable environment for pedestrians. Also, in FY19, Core Columbia was permitted to use PMRs for "enhanced lighting" for the same intent.

Purchase of Landscaping Amenities for Pedestrian Safety and Beautification
The LIA is requesting the use of PMRs and/or PRFs to acquire, install and/or maintain, where needed, landscaping amenities in the public right-of-way to create a safety barrier between vehicles and pedestrians. The Piazza della Famiglia is an example of where landscaping amenities have been used to create a safe environment between vehicles and pedestrians.
Precedent: In FY19, Core Columbia was permitted to use PMRs for landscaping amenities for the same intent.

Enhanced Security for Pedestrian Safety

The LIA is requesting the use of PMRs and/or PRFs to subsidized payroll of an existing/established security program, Live Well, Live Safe, which manages public safety within the 48-square blocks of Little Italy. The program has shown success in creating a visible presence for visitors/residents/businesses of Little Italy and creating a safe environment for pedestrians detouring criminal activity.

Santa Clarita restricts public spaces PB-1

June 25, 2018

Homeless people there can no longer sit on sidewalks or sleep in cars on streets.

By Dakota Smith

Santa Clarita has enacted sweeping new rules barring individuals from sitting on sidewalks and sleeping in cars on public streets, joining other California municipalities that have passed laws to block homeless people from living in public spaces.

The City Council voted 5 to 0 Tuesday night for the restrictions, with council members defending the crackdown as part of a larger strategy that also includes spending $1 million to help build a homeless shelter and creating a long-term plan to combat homelessness.

Opponents at Tuesday's hearing urged the council to soften the restrictions, saying individuals in Santa Clarita are now prohibited from sitting on a curb, for instance. Homeless people "aren't going to leave Santa Clarita, if that's your hope," Logan Smith, a candidate for City Council, told officials.

With the new rules, individuals can't sit or lie down in a wide range of public spaces, including streets, sidewalks and maintained landscaped areas. Sleeping in public buildings is now prohibited, and individuals can't store their belongings in parks or public spaces.

Individuals also can't use their vehicles as dwellings in any park or public space. City officials said that rule targets people who sleep in their cars in parking lots.

A city report accompanying the new ordinance cited an increase in calls about transient encampments at parks and other public spaces in Santa Clarita.

Councilman Cameron Smyth said in an interview before the meeting that he has heard complaints about homeless people at the city library and human waste on sidewalks.

"We are trying to take a comprehensive approach to homelessness in our community," said Smyth, who sits on a committee dedicated to homelessness issues. "We don't want to kick people out of public spaces, but we can't have people sleeping in our libraries."

Santa Clarita, 30 miles north of downtown Los Angeles, has 331 homeless individuals, according to figures from the Los Angeles Homeless Services Authority. About half of that group is unsheltered.

The city is using a grant to help draft a plan to prevent and combat homelessness and has acquired two pieces of land — valued at $1 million — to help build a permanent shelter.

Passing the new restrictions required two separate votes by the City Council, and Tuesday's action was the final vote. People who violate the ordinance face fines of $100 to $500, depending on whether they had previous infractions.

Across California, laws that crack down on homelessness continue to be enacted and enforced, according to a 2015 study by the Policy Advocacy Clinic at UC Berkeley's law school. The study found that 58 California cities have laws that target homeless people by restricting standing, sitting or sleeping in public places.

Eve Garrow, policy analyst with the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California, called the ordinance "incredibly broad."

"It really prohibits being homeless in Santa Clarita," she said.

At Tuesday's meeting, Santa Clarita City Manager Ken Striplin said the city has been grappling with homeless issues for more than a decade. He contrasted the situation in Santa Clarita with the crisis in Los Angeles, which allows homeless people to sleep overnight on the streets.

"You can only go to the city of Los Angeles and see how out of control that situation has gotten," Striplin said.

Thefts rise after California reduces criminal penalties, report says

California voters' decision to reduce penalties for drug and property crimes in 2014 contributed to a jump in car burglaries, shoplifting and other theft, researchers reported.

Larcenies increased about 9% by 2016, or about 135 more thefts per 100,000 residents than if tougher penalties had remained, according to results of a study by the nonpartisan Public Policy Institute of California released Tuesday.

Thefts from motor vehicles accounted for about three-quarters of the increase. San Francisco alone recorded more than 30,000 auto burglaries last year, which authorities largely blamed on gangs. Shoplifting may be leveling off, researchers found, but there is no sign of a decline in thefts from vehicles.

Proposition 47 lowered criminal sentences for drug possession, theft, shoplifting, identity theft, receiving stolen property, writing bad checks and check forgery from felonies that can carry prison terms to misdemeanors that often bring minimal jail sentences.

Though researchers can link the measure to a rise in theft, they found it did not lead to the state's increase in violent crime.

Violent crime surged by about 13% after Proposition 47 passed, but researchers said the trend started earlier and was mainly linked to unrelated changes in crime reporting by the FBI and the Los Angeles Police Department.

The FBI broadened its definition of sexual crimes in 2014, while the LAPD improved its crime reporting after previously underreporting violent crimes. If it weren't for those changes, researchers found, California's violent crime rate would have increased 4.7% from 2014 to 2016.

Researchers compared California's crime trends to those in other states with historically similar trends. They found the increase in California's violent crime rate was less than that of comparison states, but larcenies jumped in California as they declined elsewhere.

California still has historically low crime rates despite recent changes in the criminal justice system aimed at reducing mass incarceration and increasing rehabilitation and treatment programs, said Lenore Anderson, the executive director of Californians for Safety and Justice and a leader in the drive to pass Proposition 47.

"This report shows we are making progress," she said in a statement calling for less spending on prisons and more on programs to help reduce the cycle of crime.

The ballot measure led to the lowest arrest rate in state history in 2015 as experts said police frequently ignored crimes that brought minimal punishment.

Jail bookings in 12 sample counties dropped about 8%, driven by a reduction in bookings for Proposition 47 crimes, while cite-and-releases increased, researchers found.

Offenders convicted of those crimes were about 3% less likely to be convicted of a new crime within two years, but the researchers said it's not clear if that was because they didn't commit new crimes or because they were less likely to be arrested and prosecuted due to the lower penalties.

Reduced penalties mean that fewer drug addicts seem to be getting treatment and then "are stealing to support their habit," said San Luis Obispo County Chief Probation Officer Jim Salio, president of the Chief Probation Officers of California.

Morgan Hill Police Chief David Swing, president of the California Police Chiefs Assn., said researchers' findings "are consistent with what police chiefs across the state have seen since 2014" and show the need for a proposed initiative intended for the November ballot that would partly roll back the 2014 law.

It would allow prison sentences for serial thieves, reinstate DNA collections from those convicted of the crimes for which penalties were reduced, and bar the earlier release of criminals convicted of additional violent, serious and sexual crimes.

Data shows homeless on the move in San Diego

By Gary Warth

JUNE 25, 2018, 9:35 AM | SAN DIEGO

The homeless population in San Diego has surged in some neighborhoods and dramatically dropped in others, a close look at numbers from this year's count of homeless people shows.

One area of Hillcrest saw a 960 percent increase in the number of unsheltered homeless people and a Kearny Mesa neighborhood saw its unsheltered population jump by 900 percent.

At the same time, the number of unsheltered people dropped significantly in downtown areas that traditionally have had large populations of homeless who sleep in tents, makeshift shelters and cars.

The area near Father Joe's Village and surrounding blocks, however, saw an increase in unsheltered people,

The population shift could give credence to the argument that the city's efforts to clear away downtown homeless camps last yearresulted in homeless people moving elsewhere.

It also could be a fluke. The annual count is taken in pre-dawn hours, with volunteers walking sidewalks or driving on dark streets with clipboards to look for homeless people huddled in doorways, sleeping in cars or tucked inside tents.

Weather, lighting and other conditions also can affect the number of people counted, possibly shifting the totals in areas from one year to another.

The Regional Task Force on the Homeless organized the Jan. 26 annual count, and on May 17 it released a report that found 8,576 homeless people throughout the county, a 6 percent drop from the previous year.

The report gave the number of homeless people in cities and unincorporated areas, but not individual neighborhoods.

Finding those numbers takes more digging.

To do the count, the task force broke down the city of San Diego into more than 300 census tracts, and totals of each can be found online, separate from its annual report.

The National Homeless Information Project, described by coordinator Michael Ullman as a grassroots collaboration to share information about homeless services, took a deeper dive into the data and compiled a chart comparing this year's count with one taken in January 2017, arranging them according to the greatest changes..

Even Ullman's report, however, only identifies neighborhoods by census tract numbers. The actual locations can be found by finding the tract numbers on the San Diego Association of Governments' 2010 census map, which was used by the task force in the point-in-time counts.

One of the largest changes was in the heart of Hillcrest, between University Avenue and El Cajon Boulevard, west of Park Boulevard and east of state Highway 163. The unsheltered population in that area increased by 960 percent, growing from five to 53 people since 2017.

That neighborhood had the second largest percent increase in the county, followed only by a 1,400 percent increase around UC San Diego, where the population grew from one to 15

Another increase in Hillcrest was seen near the UC San Diego Medical Center, which was up 59 percent with an increase from 17 to 27 people.

Downtown, things changed in the other direction, especially north of Market Street and south of Ash Street or

In that stretch in Golden Hill between 24th Street and Interstate 15, the number of homeless people on the street dropped from 155 to 26 since last year, an 83 percent decrease.

The 129-person drop was the largest decrease of any census tract.

The second biggest dip came just to the west in the eight blocks from Ash to Market Street between 9th and 11th streets.

In that neighborhood, which includes many tall office buildings and restaurants, the population dropped from 251 to 158, a 37 percent decrease.

West of that, the neighborhood between Ninth and State streets that includes City Hall and Civic Center Plaza saw a drop from 279 to 195 unsheltered people, a 30 percent decrease.

Sherman Heights also saw decreases. One neighborhood east of I-5 and between Market and Commercial streets saw the number of people on the street drop from 112 to 30, a 73 percent increase.

South of Commercial Street in Sherman Heights, another neighborhood saw the homeless population drop from 81 to 20, a 75 percent decrease.

Together, the homeless population in those five areas dropped by 459 people.

There's no way to know where they all went, but it's likely that the three bridge shelter tents that the city opened between the two counts may have had a role in the decline.

Together, the three have 674 beds, and two of the tents are in downtown San Diego.

It's also possible that the homeless people in areas with the biggest drops just moved slightly south, west, east or north, and some numbers suggest that may have happened.

Just to the west of neighborhoods that saw a decline, the homeless population grew 38 percent, from 90 to 124, in the Marina area that includes the Embarcadero and San Diego Convention Center.

To the east of neighborhoods that saw a drop, the area around City College saw a 117 percent increase, with the homeless population growing from 18 to 39 people.

To the south, the area with the largest and most visible homeless population got even more unsheltered people.

The neighborhood south of Market Street between I-5 and Ninth Street includes Father Joe's Village and the Neil Good Day Center, and this year's count saw the homeless population there grow from 361 to 435, a 20 percent increase.

HOUSING • Report says shortage is a threat to the local economy

The report says, however, that progress will be slow because it takes time for developers to react and for projects to get approved and built.

"The numbers in this report are a sobering reminder of the crisis we face to build housing and the importance of tracking the progress of the reforms we've implemented to spur new housing construction in the coming years," Faulconer said. "You can't change what you don't measure, so I believe sharing this information with the public is important as we push for civic action on permit streamlining and housing reforms."

The mayor has promised to produce such reports each year and to use the information to adjust the city's efforts to spur new housing construction.

Housing industry leaders praised that approach when the report was presented last week to the city's Planning Commission.

"This is an important tool in the toolbox to see what we've done and where we need to go," said Molly Kirkland, a spokeswoman for the San Diego County Apartment Association.

Matt Adams, vice president of the local chapter of the Building Industry Association, agreed.

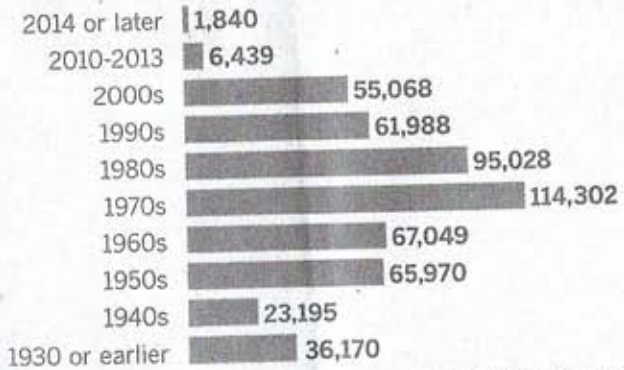
"It's very critical information," he said. "You have to know where you are to figure out where you're going."

The report says the shortage of new housing is a threat to the local economy because businesses struggle to retain high-quality employees when those employees can't find affordable housing.

Regulatory reforms and the strong economy have increased the number of new housing units approved annually from 2,115 in 2014 to 4,459 in 2016 and 5,865 in 2017.

San Diego's housing stock

By date built



Source: U.S. Census

DANIEL WHEATON U-T

The problem, city planning director Mike Hansen said, is that the number of new residents who arrive in the city each year is typically about 20,000.

The number of housing units built in San Diego in the decade of the 1970s was more than 100,000, followed by about 90,000 in the 1980s.

But that dipped sharply to about 50,000 in each of the next two decades, and has slowed even further since 2010, the report says.

"It would be interesting to find out what happened — was it policies, was it economics, what was it that changed?" Planning Commissioner Doug Austin asked during last week's hearing on the inventory report.

City officials said there isn't one single factor they can point to for the slowdown trend, which has increased the number of the city's housing units that are at least 30 years old to more than 75 percent.

San Diego is also far short of constructing the 88,100 new housing units between 2010 to 2020 required under a housing goals program called the "regional housing needs allocation."

With 18 months left, the city has constructed about 33,159 units, or 38 percent, the report says.

One city effort to fight those trends and shortfalls is a recent focus on updating growth blueprints for many of San Diego's neighborhoods.

Updating the blueprints, which are called community plans, increases the amount of housing allowed to be built there and encourages developers by letting them know what kinds of projects are likely to be approved.

An example is Grantville, an aging industrial area sandwiched between Mission Valley and San Diego State, where a new community plan has spurred significant development in the last three years.

City officials said nearly 1,000 new housing units are either under construction or have been recently completed in Grantville, which was chosen for sharp increases in housing density because the San Diego trolley's green line stops there.

The report found that San Diego has 527,000 total housing units, 286,000 single-family homes and 241,000 apartments and condominiums.

Of those units, 34,172 have rents or mortgage payments that are lower than market rate because government subsidies are attached.

San Diego City Council committee to examine regulations for dockless bike, scooter operators

BY: Jermaine Ong , City News Service

SAN DIEGO (KGTV/CNS) - A City Council committee Wednesday will discuss potential regulations, including a fee and permit system, for dockless vehicle operators in the city of San Diego.

The council's Budget and Government Efficiency Committee is expected to examine what cities with more experience with dockless vehicle programs, like Seattle, have done regarding safety and public nuisance concerns.

Dockless bike and scooter operators began service in San Diego in February, but numerous issues have come up since then.

Many San Diegans have complained about seeing the scooters and bikes cluttering neighborhoods and sidewalks. Injury concerns have also been raised, as some say riders are using the bikes or scooters without helmets or are riding in restricted areas.

close

The issue led to the proposal of a temporary ban on scooters on Mission Beach's boardwalk, but that idea was voted down by the City Council last month.

Now, Councilwoman Barbara Bry and the committee she chairs will work to come up with an ordinance to bring back to the Budget Committee in the fall.

"We need to figure out how to deal with this in a reasonable way and also what kind of fee structure is reasonable. We can use these fees to invest in infrastructure to support them," Bry said.

Proceeds from a permit and fee system would fund enforcement activities related to safety issues.

Proposed payment mechanisms include application fees, annual per-bike fees, bike removal fees and performance bond fees.

The discussion is an informational item; no committee action is needed.

Gentlemen,

My apologies. What I sent you previously was what current law already dictates. Here is what AB 2989 specifically will do:

1) Defines a "standup electric scooter" as a two-wheeled device that has handlebars and a floorboard that is designed to be stood upon while riding, is powered by an electric motor of less than 750 watts, and does not exceed a speed of 20 miles per hour (mph). This bill specifically excludes standup electric scooters from the definition of a motorized scooter.

2) Authorizes a person to operate a standup electric scooter on sidewalks only in the absence of a bikeway on the adjoining street, and also to park in the same manner and at the same locations as bicycles.

3) Authorizes a local jurisdiction, transit development board, or public university, to adopt rules and regulations prohibiting or restricting persons from riding or propelling a standup electric scooter on highways, sidewalks, or roadways.
